For centuries, personal letters were the dominant mode of communication among people. The postman was one of the most awaited daily visitors in the household. Emotions varied from disappointment when the postman said 'no letter' to excitement and euphoria when he handed an inland letter card, a post card or an envelope.

The inland letter was the most preferred mode for personal communication as its contents could be protected from prying eyes. The card was mostly used for conveying simple messages not requiring confidentiality. Some chose the envelop as it could enclose several pages. The younger generation might ask: what is so great about the hand written letter? Is it not a waste of time to sit down and write on a paper which will anyway take a few days to reach the addressee when the message could be conveyed within seconds by e-mail? The advent of cheap mobile has driven another nail in the coffin of personal letter. A printed letter lacks the personal feeling and emotional affinity a written letter conveys. There is an instant rapport in the written communication which the printed message or telephonic talk could never replicate. The familiar hand writing of a dear one's evokes such happiness and delight that has to be experienced to be believed. People used to preserve letters for years as these humble pieces of paper afforded companionship in absentia.
